

Micah Norman-Pace

CAFO operations are harmful for not just the sentient animals who feel pain, fear, and stress, but is also bad for the workers and environment. Workers are often harmed through lax regulation of safety (see JBS plant strike and plenty of other documentation) and through the PTSD of slaughtering thousands of animals. The environmental conditions devastate the living conditions of surrounding properties and households, impacting water supply and breathable air. For me, no factory operation is ethical, but one of this size and scale are easy for all people to be against.