May I suggest that you look at other options for dealing with the waste. I have friends that live in upstate New York and run a dairy farm. They convert all of their waste to methane gas and literally produce all the power that they need to run the operation. That seems to me a better alternative than trying to spread all the waste on adjacent farmland. Maybe a combination of the two options would be better. If you would like the names of my friends in New York I would provide that with their permission.
