

Shannon Nieland

I hope that the MPCA recognizes Riverview's long history of doing right by the communities it's established in. Not only do they invest into communities through their support of agriculture education, community events, sports and employment, they also build operations that are sustainable. When it comes to pollution and manure seepage, I have seen no evidence of any case of water contamination at previous sites, and I would encourage the MPCA to examine their track record.

Many of the towns in West Central Minnesota are dead or dying, with little to no growth in businesses or recreation. In contrast, our community in Morris is growing and thriving—in large part due to companies like Riverview investing into it and supporting communities and families like mine.