

Jody Benson

An issue EV opponents always raise is the lack of infrastructure. Infrastructure follows policy -- look at the explosion of private cars after funding the development of the interstate highway system. You make the policy, car manufacturers will ensure there are charging stations.

Homeowners will be encouraged to solarize their homes to have free charging. If policy-makers aren't persuaded by health and climate concerns, if "it's the economy, stupid" is the primary argument, then the argument for EVs wins. This time it actually IS the consumers' choice for healthier kids, healthier environment, and so much cheaper to drive. Make the policy. It is the consumer's choice.