

Barbara Vezzani

Of course, it's not just the air pollution, but water consumption, overall environmental disruption, and the way AI in general is being rammed down the public's throat without consent. It is my belief that the majority of New Mexicans share a deep love and reverence for the open land. During the first broadcast re. Project Jupiter, I was shocked to hear on NPR how the majority of the panel railroaded the woman who called in with cogent concerns. They just ran over her comments by propagandizing so-called "safeguards" and other "benefits" to the region. The public is not buying it. It is time to renew and sustain New Mexico's commitment to conservation and land use restrictions, especially since few other states have such abundant natural beauty, archaeological treasures, scenic lakes and rivers, night sky advantages, and cultural identity and pride that we consider essential in our region.