Paul, don't quote me, but this looks insane. First, I doubt that many people have suffered from heat prostration or heat stroke even in the construction industry. People know how to accommodate high heat, and even the Simon Legrees of heavy work know that their workers are not going to get much done if they are laid out from the heat. Perhaps if the rule set the standard at triple digits, it might make some sense. Second, the amount of administrative work also seems excessive; people have jobs, not paperwork, to do to make a living.
