

Misha Ash

There needs to be much more scrutiny, public input, and transparency before allowing any such project. At a time when climate disruptions are on the rise, including droughts and extreme weather events, what justification is there to allow such massive energy and water usage? Maybe these developers and technologists need to go back to the drawing board to create something that will not impose such severe harms on the environment and local communities, as we already know from comparable projects across the country.