The last thing we need in our beautiful state is a data center. Although it's purpose and funding may seem to be a viable resource for our community, we are not prepared for the consequences. Areas that were once open desert, housing local wildlife, will become concrete shoeboxes that pollute our air, drain our water, and set a precedent that we value data centers more than the word of the people living in these areas. To accept this project is to accept that we do not care for our planet or for one another. Please, keep New Mexico clean.
