

Sophia Woudwijk

AI is a disastrous thing for environment and human beings. No matter what argument you could give, nothing could outweigh the cost. Climate Change is both one of the biggest AVOIDABLE ecological disasters in history, while there is an argument that in a consumerist world—that there is somehow more money to be made and things to be extracted from all of us. Animals and the earth. It is not about the right controlling everything—there is no argument somehow over that, nor the morality of the pedophilia we've been normalize to move past—it is that even socially we are different. Humans never had a population this large, nor a lifestyle this different. We were nomads, or lived life very simply. There is no indication of us needing a system that pushes when things flow naturally and are. Things that are there. I can see life in the way that is different, especially this summer. Rain is a consistent thing, the river—the north Saskatchewan—has risen several feet because of the magnitude. Besides the life outside of my phone, I feel that winters where I live up north, are warmer and wet. Where we used to go for winter hiking in the Rockies, there barely 1-2 feet of snow. The lack of biodiversity with bugs that would cloud my mom's windshield or find themselves in my room, is also a simple thing; though the mosquitoes in my city are very, very bad. We need to fight, we need to try—otherwise we will have no future. Indifference will be the literal death of us all. I can also speak Spanish.