I have seen the barrels of waste sitting outdoors at LANL for many years. They should have been removed long ago to protect New Mexicans. The danger of wildfire is all too apparent, and ash that is transported by wind would absolutely be inhaled by people, admitting cancerous substances into lungs. Ash that remains in place would ultimately be carried into the Rio Grande, where it could affect the health and lives of New Mexicans and Texans both. It is astounding that the barrels remain where they are. Move them to safety!
