

Earl Fernandez

The inspection fees are long overdue for a raise. In fact, I am for Texas, raising the "fixed price" of inspections to $100. This would allow the inspection station's owners and management to determine the appropriate price competition based on their region.

Texas Department of Public Safety (DPS) sets the maximum price for vehicle inspections in Texas and allows inspection stations to set their own prices within that range. However, no stations charge less than the maximum because while this price remains the same, inflation raises the cost of everything around us.

I firmly believe that Texas should adopt a more adaptable approach, suggesting a retail price for inspection rather than a long-term fixed price. The current fixed prices, which fail to account for inflation, are unfair and undervalue the inspection service as the cost of rent, utilities, consumables, and labor continue to rise.

The inspection fees are long overdue for a raise. In fact, I am for Texas, raising the "fixed price" of inspections to $100. This would allow the inspection station's owners and management to determine the appropriate price competition based on their region.

Texas Department of Public Safety (DPS) sets the maximum price for vehicle inspections in Texas and allows inspection stations to set their own prices within that range. However, no stations charge less than the maximum because while this price remains the same, inflation raises the cost of everything around us.

I firmly believe that Texas should adopt a more adaptable approach, suggesting a retail price for inspection rather than a long-term fixed price. The current fixed prices, which fail to account for inflation, are unfair and undervalue the inspection service as the cost of rent, utilities, consumables, and labor continue to rise.