

Frank Jasper

With little to no increase over many years, there is no use for stations to help the state with keeping the Texas air clean. State does not prioritize the service it seems. There is no incentive to continue. Eventually the state will have to pay to have stations open and remain open. The tide is turning. The state will have lesser stations and worse environmental over time. All because the state does not want to support , increase, or subsidize stations that are critical. The state enforces laws that are strict on stations as they care. In reality these laws are a sham. There will be no stations for the state to enforce the laws. The leverage is diminishing over the time. It's only a matter of time.