I think ethics should be mandatory. However, TWQA is not interested in pursuing license enforcement as they feel that would cause more gov scrutiny of our current WTS license system and SOPs. I was told that cause us to do more work or watch what we do. But with the right enforcement, we could possibly clean up the competition in Texas and bring more business in for those who are licensed. As it stands right now, any schmo can walk off the street, buy a water softener from Waterworld, sell and install it at someone's home with out any repercussions. They could hook it up backwards. With that said, whether ethics are or are not included with licensing, it really doesn't matter because no one will enforce or even check distributors, dealers or work. Enforcement should start with distributors. Why aren't they licensed? They hold just as much responsibility for the publics wellbeing than anyone else. An ethical, responsible system could be set up to make sure equipment was purchased by, installed and maintained by licensed people. This system should also generate millions a year in revenue. But...
