

Erin McAbee

I oppose this regulation. As a licensed PCA I and almost all my colleagues are already doing these practices. The use of beneficial insects is growing rapidly, and producers do not want to spend money on costly chemistries if they are unneeded. These regulations make it seem like food producers do not have the public and environment in mind while that could be further from the truth. We are already struggling to control various insects and viruses and taking away tools will lead to more insect resistance and many more applications. Regulations like this will ultimately lead to much higher food prices.