

Jamie Zivney

I am writing to oppose regulations that could significantly increase gasoline prices in California. My family is a single-income household, and my husband commutes to work every day. Fuel costs are already a major burden for us, and even a small increase in gas prices would have a real impact on our ability to cover basic expenses.

Many working families like mine are already struggling with the high cost of living in California. Policies that could add additional costs at the pump risk placing even more strain on households that are barely making ends meet.

I respectfully ask the California Air Resources Board to carefully consider the economic impact on everyday families when making decisions about new regulations. Please pursue solutions that balance environmental goals with affordability for working Californians.

