

Andrew Burgin

Wildcard fires are natural sources of air pollutants with up to 20 million acres estimated per year prior to European settlements. Continuing to focus on so-called "man-made" sources leaves less resources available to control fires at every level and will result in an increase in air pollution and greenhouse gases from wildcard fires. Not only should no new regulations be included but the program in its entirety should be repealed.