

James Rankin

At this time, further restrictions on carbon offsets may simply increase global carbon emissions because fuel will make longer journeys to reach markets as more California refineries close. That's no longer just a hypothetical risk, and you should hesitate before plunging ahead with counterproductive restrictions. Beyond that, higher fuel costs will weigh most heavily upon people least able to afford them. And, higher energy costs will drive businesses out of California.