

Dee Anne Finken

Vancouver Lake serves a metropolitan area of more than a half million people. This summer, the water quality was so poor the lake was closed to major events as well as to families and individuals who sought to recreate there on their own.

Because of the size of the region it serves and the value it offers the population, it is imperative that the state make restoring the water quality one of its priorities.