

Deon Rowley

As a concerned resident of Brighton Beach, I have both support and opposition for the upcoming Brighton Beach Waterfront project. On the one hand, I am excited about the potential benefits that the project could bring to the community. The revitalization of the waterfront could create new opportunities for residents, including improved recreational facilities and increased access to the water. It could also serve as a hub for community events and gatherings. I have serious concerns about the potential negative impacts of the project on the local environment and cultural resources. Specifically, I worry about the impact on marine life and water quality in the area. The construction and increased traffic that the project is likely to bring could have serious consequences for the health of the local ecosystem, potentially harming marine animals and other wildlife. The potential for increased pollution and toxins from the construction and traffic could pose risks to the health of the community and local waterways. Moreover, I am concerned about the potential impacts of the project on cultural resources in the area. Brighton Beach has a rich history and cultural heritage, and it is important that we take steps to preserve and protect these resources for future generations. I worry that the project could have negative impacts on local cultural resources, potentially eroding the character and identity of the community.